Summary

This work focuses on issues around the legal-administrative problem of personal data protection in the police. The nature of the issues addressed, in the practical layer, comes down to outline the processes of personal data processing by this uniformed formation. The dissertation attempts to reflect the complexity of these processes as well as to present the complicated nature of those that, due to their characteristics, can cause difficult perception in assigning them to the appropriate legal act for the protection of personal data. An in-depth analysis of normative sources, setting directions for the purposes and measures of data processing in the Police, was carried out in the direction of determining whether the legal system in the area in question has the qualities of consistency, transparency and completeness. The conclusions of the research confirm the existing areas with potential for improvement, in view of which the conclusion of the work formulates de lege ferenda proposals that can restore the outstanding legal status in the relevant cases.
